

Ethics of the collaborative project in teams

Dr Jamie Brassett, University of the Arts London

Duration of video clip: 1 minute and 58 seconds

From watching this film it's clear to me that it's a team endeavour and it made me think about the ethics of collaborative projects with teams and it's absolutely key to what I do. Managing innovation among a team needs an ethical consideration. Which means any sort of management is determined by our relationships with each other, and ethics is a measure of the impact that we have on each other. So one cannot manage but ethically. Well one should not manage but ethically, maybe is better to say. So when one is working in a collaborative team, one needs to make sure that each of our team members, teams and members, has a role, has agency, has a point at which they can act within that team, and maybe even act with dignity. So that the whole piece of work is considered by a group of people for whom that work is a dignified activity, that is especially true when we have people from outside our teams working with us, and I think what was what was key from my watching of Justine, is that here was a woman and her family, who were dignified and who came out of that film with their dignity intact. I think it was really important.