

Being guided by contributors' responses

Dr Alison Clarke, University College London, Thomas Coram Research Unit

Duration of video clip: 41 seconds

So I think my guidelines for working on the ethics of consent with people who are unable to give formal consent, would be around looking firstly for tuning into body language, to be aware that those moments where they're glancing away for example from the camera, where they're more attentive to other things happening where you as the researcher or a student, might need to say have you had enough now do you want to stop? So you're looking for those moments when you need to articulate what your participant may not be able to articulate, so that would be my starting point.