

The purpose of the research

Dr Alison Clarke, University College London

Duration of video clip: 1 minute and 3 seconds

I think my starting point for thinking about the ethics of representation is what is the purpose of this research or inquiry, and being very clear about the purpose I think then helps you think through the decisions that you need to make as a maker or as a student in terms of who is this for, and what does it what is it going to look like, what I'm making. I would always seek to share that with the participants and then I think it's a question of, to what degree do you alter what you have made as a response. And so for some of those moments, I see that in terms of making something for the participants themselves, that is only sometimes shared with the participants, and then thinking about it in terms of a series of different output some of which might reach a more public audience, but about being clear what's appropriate to be shared.